<td>PSC 201</td>
<td>Race, Law, and Politics</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>This course acknowledges the challenges posed by America's legacy of white supremacy and explores constitutional, political, and cultural efforts to overcome that legacy. In the first unit of the course, we lay a foundation for the course by considering the political ideals and compromises at the heart of the American experiment. We examine the shifting coalition politics that set the stage for civil war and the new constitutional politics that follow the war. In the second unit, we next consider the civil rights movement of the Twentieth Century, growing agency within the black community, and counter-movements in law and culture. In the third unit of the course, we draw upon the context provided by the first two units to evaluate critically the current moment in American racial politics—including the ways in which the rise of a new rhetorical presidency, social media, and the ubiquitous filming of everyday life expose lingering racial bias in law and culture.</td>

PSC 338 Refugee Resettlement in the United States
3 Credits
This is a seminar focused on exploring, appreciating, and unpacking refugee resettlement through scholarship and the voices of (former) refugees. Students will be assigned a variety of readings that provide a comprehensive understanding of the displacement, trauma, forced migration, and jarring arrival of the group of immigrants whom we call refugees. This course begins with an understanding of the Holocaust and its effect on international law and the United Nations and the creation of the founding documents governing refugees. We will continue by breaking down international law, and then shift to examining how refugee resettlement works in the United States and in comparative context. Students will gain a profound appreciation for the refugee experience. The course will grapple with theoretical notions of borders, belonging, citizenship and 'illegality,' while concurrently using intersectional theories to understand how immigration politics are "raced" and "gendered."
